Doctors must not do euthanasia if a patient is suffering from potentially treatable conditions, like depression. "Doctors have a duty to prevent euthanasia and should not help patients end their lives", according to Dr Benjamin Carlier, Belgium's First Psychiatrist. The statement is from a network of Belgian doctors who are against euthanasia. Dr Carlier and the group of doctors want to warn other doctors of what he feels is a risk in the Belgian government's plan to legalise euthanasia. They believe that once the euthanasia law is signed into law, any person will be able to easily get euthanasia, and that this could change the practice of doctors. Sandra den Boer, a general physician in the Netherlands, has died by euthanasia while suffering from severe depression. She fought a long, painful battle in court to get euthanasia. At her burial in The Hague, her husband commented that with euthanasia, "Death has been granted, suffering has been relieved", and that doctors are complicit in this. He said that doctors should not be the ones to decide whether people live or die. Replying to a Belgian doctor's question about euthanasia, Belgium's Minister of Justice Koen Geens said that doctors shouldn't try to end a life. However, he said that doctors could offer patients life-prolonging drugs with the hope that the patient will go on to die naturally after an adequate period of time has passed. The euthanasia law states that the only condition under which euthanasia can be performed is if the patient's suffering is "unbearable and intolerable". So even if the patient has mild cognitive problems, like Alzheimer's, they are not eligible for euthanasia because the condition is not "unbearable and intolerable".1.
